

Brief description:

"Burbujarronas" is a first-person narrative game about a journey through the psyche of an elderly woman who has romantic encounters with a fragile and disgusting bubble.

History:

Amparo is an elderly woman who, due to her physical condition, avoids going upstairs in her own house because she struggles with stairs and fears an accident might happen. One ordinary day at home, she notices a strange smell coming from one of the upstairs rooms. After investigating, she discovers it originates from the bathroom, which has long been out of use. She turns on the faucet, and a disgusting sludge comes out. It gets stuck, refusing to flow down the drain. The liquid is neither alive nor dead; it's like an agonizing syrup, similar to a teratoma, with hair, teeth, eyes, and a bubbling surface. Among the bubbles, one captivates her—it's the most beautiful, the most precious, the most perfect bubble she's ever seen. Due to the toxins in the fluid, Amparo becomes intoxicated, affecting her brain and driving her to behave strangely with the bubble. The liquid remains there throughout the game, but that detail is inconsequential.

Pre-cinema monologue:

It's been such a long time since I've felt this way—I'm starting to feel the butterflies fluttering in my stomach again. Today, I'm having my first date with someone I met not too long ago. The plan is to go to the movies, and I've chosen a romantic film. I hope they get the message. I feel so excited!

Post-cinema monologue:

I think she didn't like me. I was close to her chromatic shapes, but she pulled away, and my heart burned. What's wrong with me? Why must God punish me this way? It would have been better if I never had met her... If only I could see myself in her reflection one more time and ask her why she doesn't like me, why she doesn't long for me, why. Alone in the middle of this ocean of night, no friends, no warmth—what do you want me to say?

Pre-Restaurant monologue:

I can't believe it—she wants to meet with me again. This time, I won't disappoint her. This time will be special. There is no imperfection in her; surely that's what paralyzes me, what mesmerises me, what holds me back. Her round shapes captivate me; her bright, smooth, and delicate outline makes me yearn for her. Her exquisite figure turns me into a slave to her love. I love you, I desire you, I need you—you are the driving force of my existence. Please, don't ever leave me. Thank you for giving me another chance. I'm starting to believe you're the best thing that's ever happened to me.

post-restaurant monologue:

I felt so nervous—she must have noticed. Stupid, stupid, stupid, stupid, stupid, stupid, stupid... you're so stupid. You don't deserve anything. You don't know how to be around people. Why are you like this? She definitely realized it; she's not going to want to see you again. You made a fool of yourself. You're horrible. I hate you.

pre-picnic monologue:

Thank you! Thank you! Thank you, God, for granting me your favor once again! Today we'll meet again—I can hardly contain how excited I am. My hands are damp and cold, my teeth are chattering, my eyelids are twitching. It's all because I have a surprise planned for her: I'm going to sketch her delicious figure on paper so that her beauty is preserved forever, now and always, to keep her close to me—even if one day we no longer have each other.

post-picnic monologue:

I deserve nothing. I'm scum, a despicable being—that's all I am. I've made her uncomfortable again; she'll never want to see me again. Such a perfect creation as her has never existed, and even less so could someone so exquisitely divine ever be drawn to someone as abhorrent as me. Just seeing her paralyzes the muscles of my entire being; a thread of saliva drips from my mouth, soaking my clothes. Gazing upon her is like beholding something divine, as if she were a seraph. I want her with me, by my side, for all eternity—but someone so flawless could never notice someone like me.

pre-fuck monologue:

It's the best day of my life. I'm going to merge with her; we're going to fuse into a fluid overflowing with lust and desire, a fiery elixir of life. A myriad of stars has announced that today is the chosen day—the universe wasn't lying. I'm going to surrender myself, unleash myself; we're going to be happy together. Today is our great union. I'm bursting with excitement; I need her. I'm drenched in sweat. I'm happy, yet nervous. I crave her essence, to feel her fragile body close to my flesh. The delicate, soft hair on my skin stands on end. I don't know if this is a divine sin or what she makes me feel. I've never felt this way before. I'm behaving recklessly; I'm consumed. I long to lick every inch of her body, to savor her sweet taste on my tongue. She is my heaven. She is my sun. She is my rainbow. She is my future, my present, and my past. She is the radiant valley of a thousand moons. She is the dark alley of my blindness. She is the mountain of passion in my delirium. She is.

